If there is any book which I would not think twice to read AGAIN, it is this book. Those who know me, know that most of my work and study has been in apologetics. After all, it was apologetics which took me out of Catholicism, into atheism, back to Christianity, into anti-Catholicism, and finally back into the Roman Catholic Church. The reason is simple, why apologetics is very important: That is, our relationship with God stands on two pillars, one of which is often overlooked. Our Christian identity depends on both faith and reason. I spent so long learning the logical foundations of the Catholic faith (and still continue to do so today), but I forgot to balance this with the development of my faith. If there is a book which will help you to do this, I think this book is a great first step. The ancient philosophers lived by it, and the modern day philosophers abhor it. But, the faith message which Jesus taught us, is virtue, in the service of others. This is life's true love, service to God, and service to our brothers and sisters. Hence the saying: you cannot serve two masters, God and money. Archbishop Dolan takes us into his reflections, from his experience in catechesis and as a shepherd of the flock, through topics such as: Faith; Hope; Humility; Love and Chastity; Human Formation; Patience; Penance; Joy; Obedience; and Devotion to Our Lady. Excellent stories. One of which, in the Penance chapter, literally drove me to tears, as the story was just so meaningful and beautiful. Truly, the man whose story was told, is a saint of God. We are all called to be saints. Though we always seem to fall short of such a title, it is always something to strive for. St. Therese's faith was not as "legendary" as say St.
